The purpose of DSpace is to promote the widest possible dissemination by collecting and preserving intellectual output and ensuring that it has high visibility and accessibility. The Social Economy DSpace site is focused on the works, publications and research by persons involved in researching and writing about matters pertaining to the Social Economy. Your work matters. The Social Economy DSpace site collects and disseminates materials written by both academics and practitioners. If you want your research to be widely accessible to the community in a format that retains your rights as an author, ensures preservation and copyright protection and is safe and easy to use, the Social Economy DSpace site will meet your needs. Who submits materials to this site? Researchers, practitioners from SE organizations, and other interested parties. How does it work? There is an easy electronic submission process – simple online forms for submission of materials. Fill in the registration form and attach all necessary files. Can I submit both published and unpublished works? Yes. For unpublished works, the Creative Commons License is applied allowing you to select the rights you wish to retain and those you wish to grant to others. For published works, many major publishing firms now allow copies to be deposited in the home repository of the original author. We can advise authors on their rights and available options. How do others find my work? Items retrievable by web search engines like Google. Similarly, disciplinary or other academic "harvesters" gather information from repository collections to provide a single source for searching multiple sites simultaneously. This significantly increases the visibility of an author's work. Also, permanent URLs are assigned to each item in the repository allowing for persistent access and identification of resources. The open access nature of the repository contributes to increased access to valuable resources for individuals or institutions unable to afford subscriptions to expensive journals.
